

I feel like the inquiry paper was definitely the most learning experience out of all of the 3 papers that I did for this course. I learned how to maintain the balance of doing research, analyzing, and explaining my inquiry questions along with having the creative freedom that I experienced throughout the first essay of “This I no longer believe”. In addition, I learned how to refer back to Aristotle's 3 appeals as I made connections throughout the topics I focused on in the paper. As far as revisions or what I could have done better, I'd say that the research for this paper could have been done a little better because I did find enough information required to fulfill, but I feel that now that process could have been better with digging a little deeper towards finding more research for my topics so that it can be more closely supported. But overall, I felt that just finding my research could have been better. This paper showcases how I have little to no knowledge of a topic that made me not only just research but also learn more about it. I found it interesting how controversial the topic I chose affects the modern world today and the consequences it has caused. Lastly, this paper helped me improve my way of thinking and maintain the balance of having requirements for a paper be projected towards everything to one.
